Dear Mr. [REDACTED]

Thank you for your email message of September 27, 2018, regarding your company's solar power products, specifically its ElectricWheel technology. I regret the delay in responding.

Although I am unable to speak with you in person, please allow me to provide you with some information that may be useful to your company.

The Government of Canada is committed to increasing the amount of zero-emissions vehicles on Canada's roads. The Honourable Marc Garneau, Minister of Transport, and the Honourable Navdeep Singh Bains, Minister of Innovation, Science and Economic Development, announced in 2017 that a national advisory group had been established to inform the development of a Canada-wide strategy for zero-emission vehicles.

This group, which includes representatives from provincial and territorial governments, industry, non-governmental organizations and academia, is helping to identify possible options for addressing barriers for greater deployment of these technologies in five areas: vehicle supply, costs and benefits of ownership, infrastructure readiness, public awareness, and clean growth and clean jobs. Consultations took place during the summer and fall of 2017. Information collected during this process is currently being assessed to determine the design of the Canada-wide strategy.

In addition, the Government is making key investments to support the transition to a low-carbon transportation system. Budget 2016 and Budget 2017 allocated $62.5 million and $120 million, respectively, to deploy infrastructure for electric vehicle charging and refuelling stations for alternative fuel such as hydrogen. These resources will also support technology demonstration projects that advance electric vehicle charging technology.
